While Jennifer Clay was at home taking an online exam for her business law class, a proctor a few hundred miles away was watching her every move. Using a webcam mounted in Clay's Los Angeles apartment, the monitor tracked how frequently her eyes moved from the computer screen and listened for the sounds of a possible helper in the room. Her computer browser was locked - remotely - to prevent Internet searches, and her typing pattern was analyzed to make sure she was who she said she was: Did she enter her password with the same rhythm as she had in the past?

An online college course provider announced Wednesday that Yale University has joined the growing network of campuses that offer free classes through the organization. They said that Yale will offer four courses initially -- Roman architecture, financial markets, moralities of everyday life and constitutional law -- which brings the total number of universities that offer courses through the group to 70. Millions worldwide take these kinds of free online courses through several organizations, most of which offer the courses without college credit.

California and other states are failing to educate most of the 70,000 young people who are put at any given time in rehabilitation centers, according to a national report released Thursday. "Most young people fail to earn any course credits or complete their high school diploma or any other degree while in custody", the report by the Southern Education Foundation found. Yet these young inmates are highly troubled - usually struggling with drug abuse, anger and failing academic achievement - and need effective education to help them get back on track, the report said.
